Here are some of the feedback from our valued users.The present invention relates to the field of insulation systems, and more particularly, to a glass insulation system having a silicone based sealant. A variety of insulation systems are available for insulating windows, doors and other openings in buildings. For example, butyl rubber is one common window insulation material, particularly for larger glazed openings such as windows and doors. However, the use of butyl rubber requires that the user must apply the butyl rubber in a vacuum. Other insulation materials can be difficult to apply in a vacuum and may require special equipment and labor to install. In view of the above, it would be desirable to provide an insulation system that is easy to apply and does not require a vacuum. It is an object of the present invention to provide a glass insulation system. It is another object of the present invention to provide a window insulation system that does not require a vacuum. It is a further object of the present invention to provide a window insulation system that is easy to apply. It is still a further object of the present invention to provide a window insulation system that is easy to install. These and other objects of the present invention are accomplished by an insulation system in which a flexible thermoplastic sealant is used to seal a gap between two substantially parallel
