What's a good story? Well, if you take into consideration popular literature and film, it seems that when faced with a story, people want to know who is going to win and how it all ends, which are two sides of the same coin, because without either, the story wouldn't be complete. Without a proper conclusion, the story falls apart in that we don't understand how the protagonists are going to resolve the conflict that made us love them in the first place.On the other hand, there are stories, such as the stories of our lives, or those of real people around us, that are self-contained within themselves. A person's entire life story is a self-contained story: born, learned, wondered, grew, fell in love, ate, laughed, cried, aged, died, and it all ends with "And so it came to pass that he died". You could easily make a movie out of that, but you wouldn't know who won the battle, who lost, who lived, who died, who was good or who was evil, and all you would see is that the main character, who is the protagonist of the story, went on a journey, fulfilled his or her goals, and fulfilled his or her destiny.Going back to that "great story" thing, we have to ask ourselves why most stories don't quite fit the mold. Why do most stories set-up conflict, focus on character (who are both good and evil), and then the antagonists win? Why is there no proper conclusion, or resolution? Why do most movies set-up a cliffhanger ending? Why is there never a happy ending?Why don't I have any answers? However, I do. There is one reason why a story should not end in happy ever after. The main reason is that an ending "should" be the point where everything is resolved

What's new:

Could End Homelessness 07/05/2018 by Sara Jane Smillie Atonia Casdorf, Frederic Bauer The status quo isn't acceptable. Our inability to tackle homelessness for good — a third of our global population lives in or on the street or with friends, fellow travelers or relatives — is an abject failure. The United States, unlike any other First World nation in history, has failed to provide basic necessities to its poorest citizens. It's an embarrassment for people from any other country to visit and see a country that exudes luxury, but any evidence of homelessness and exploitation is in evidence in every urban center and small town in the vastness of the US. Most people throughout the world know Donald Trump as the current US president. Lesser-known facts about Trump and his administration illustrate broader systemic problems with the U.S. political and economic systems. Trump borrowed $1.5 billion from Equifax and used it to buy Twitter for $26 million in November of 2016. A follow-up lawsuit revealed that this was not the first time Trump had borrowed money from people who were going to be his partners and strangers. Trump receives nearly $3 billion in income a year. Half of America's 1,100 billionaires' wealth came from Trump's oil companies. Bennet Jennings is a philosophy professor at SUNY Albany. He believes in the next revolution - to use AI as a means for big data to approximate future labor market conditions. From the Harvard Business Review: HBR MAGAZINE: Bennet, could you talk about the concept that individuals or communities can learn to manage situations that are beyond their current means? JENNINGS: We're in the worst economic recovery since we came out of the Second World War. We're slowly heading into another long-term recession. For all the rhetoric about how the stock market is doing so great, they all work for people who own stock. So people who are not included in that equation are in a horrible position. However, the stock market has shown resilience in the past. We need to make sure that resilience is more than just inertia. We need to flip the switch and bring back businesses from the future. We need to adapt to the new world in which half of our economics is likely to be automated and we need to reverse the trends of reducing the workforce and eliminating traditionally middle class jobs.
