base.send(:def_method, :do_stuff) base.send(:attr_reader

I know when we make an application we need to give the screen size of the application. Now my question is : Can I give the screen size of an application in the iphone application instead of placing a view on the main window? A: Yes, you can, but by default the window size is 320x460. The easiest way to make it smaller is to put a navigation controller on top of your main window (instead of a tab bar). After that, when you go through to your "main" view controller by pressing the navigation bar button, the screen will be resized automatically. If you don't want a navigation bar, that's when you can use autoresizing or iAutoLayout in Interface Builder. Devices such as a laser beam emitter is used on vehicles such as four-wheel drive vehicles that have a four-wheel drive mechanism. The devices are placed at a region where a change in a vehicle speed is large, such as a region where a turning radius of a vehicle is short and a region where a vehicle speed significantly decreases. As a result, driving stability of the vehicles is improved. In other words, since a device such as a laser beam emitter effectively reduces a turning radius of a vehicle, the device can reduce a risk of a sudden vehicle running. A ratio of power of a laser beam emitter to a battery voltage increases when a vehicle travels to a region where a vehicle speed increases. In other words, in the case where a battery voltage decreases because a driver of the vehicle stops traveling, a laser beam emitter can be driven with a small driving current. On the other hand, when a vehicle travels to a region where a vehicle speed decreases, a laser beam emitter can be driven with a large driving current. Thus, the laser beam emitter is not driven with a large driving current even when a current value to be supplied to the battery varies. Thus, energy efficiency of the device is increased. Even in a state of stop of a
