The sensor, which consists of a thin film of graphene oxide, can detect tiny variations in the ionic signal that creates the electrical potential generated by brain waves. Currently, the most commonly used method of monitoring these brain waves is through the use of an electroencephalogram (EEG), which is a bioelectrical measure of brain activity by measuring the electric potential that is generated by the neurons as they fire. However, this measure is very crude, as it only shows the overall response of the brain to external stimuli such as music or light. A more advanced measure of brain activity would be to accurately monitor the activity of each neuron or region of the brain, or at least the electric potential generated by a particular region of the brain. The sensor developed by the TAU team, which they have named the "ENTEK," or Graphene Electroencephalogram (EEG), can monitor the ionic movements that create electrical potential inside the brain, and thus
