Ada goes beyond the classic languages of today. The language compiler you can download from the Ada website is called GNAT. We will use the GNAT compiler to solve some problems. Problem 1: A messagebox will display a message. In the following code, we create a new procedure called MessageBox The procedure MessageBox() takes two arguments. What's new in Espire 1: VR Operative:

Arrives To Support The Junkers Amid the disarray of the Second World War, in the German 7th Army's retreat during the Battle of the Bulge, the makeshift, hastily formed German 92nd Heavy Panzer had a potentially vital role to fulfil during its redeployment to contact the First United States Army in the east. Concealed within a snow cone in American hands to the North-East, the German tankers had little contact with the US 7th. But when the American First Army reached the abandoned Kraut division, logistical support from their German brethren made the difference. Here Lies The Deceit Three courageous 2nd SS Panzer Corps troopers, led by Major Otto Wolf, raced through enemy lines in a cold and blizzard, to reach the VSS Army in the US 1st Corps and beseech them to provide succour in spite of the incessant rain, snow and freezing conditions. Fuel was already scarce in the even-blacked-out, deserted and exposed western German positions, but German need and supply dictated that the journey to the enemy was made. The men were ready, wet, cold and starving, so they stood and waited for a JU88 transport plane to lower the cargo to them. Here lies the problem. The Germans knew, their presence would be identified immediately from the plane's silhouette, even it it was under the Eastern Cross. The plane could be one of the British moving supplies but, too, it could be a Russian one – the height of the wings would have left no doubts. The best answer was to land in the middle of the woods, far enough from the front to allow them to be carried to the US 20th Infantry Corp. Firing their guns at their current state was hardly a sensible move. As the heavy steel canisters fell, it was the first time that the men had seen what they were to receive. Stacks of tins, all neatly stacked and serially stacked, would feed the supplies through the inefficient US 20th Infantry Supply system into the country side; in fact all that the Germans needed to do was rake the tins across the woodland, away from the frontline trenches. The very fact of delivering the supplies, instead of arranging for the already strained American supply system to receive them, is questionable. It is an argument for the presence of Otto, Schumacher and Neumyrer, or the mission not even have been performed. One would surmise that it

Although not the fastest of the British steam locomotives, it is the most popular of the four British classes of 0-6-0 steam locomotives. With the steam locos, it was a matter of scale again. The BR were proud of their line of 0-6-0 locomotives. They were the backbone of the railway, the enablers of the modern railways of today. Steam was king! Because the non-passenger locomotive class were delivered to the various depots in convoy, they were usually fully loaded before departure. The BR were not alone in that, and they were used to a large degree of the heavy freight loads required along much of the British railway network. They would have taken very long journeys, often to far-flung destinations such as Scotland, Eire and Canada. They would have been in service for many years too. Developed in the 1950's, the class were designed around the operating constraints of steam railways, from the tipping point of the firebox and its heat to the efficiency of the boilers. The Class saw a great deal of service, both in passenger and freight work, and they remain ever popular with modellers to this day. The rail wagons also made very useful express cargo units. The wagon designs have inspired many of the standard broad gauge wagons of today. The locomotives are a match for passenger duties, although this would be a battle of endurance. For the heavy haulage tasks, the Class performed faultlessly and they were amongst the first steam engines to be equipped with the modern smoke deflector equipment. Their sheer size and the comparative lack of weight in the classes meant they were well suited for hauling freight trains at high speed. What does appear to have been a measure of practicality in the design is a hint of ingenuity; a water inlet on the underside of the firebox tank which proved to be handy when it was needed to quick cool the boiler. The Class is one of those locomotives that is greatly loved and equally loved to hate. It has that certain look, that seems to be inevitable. It is almost like the steam locos are saying: "Here we are! Get used to us! We are something special!" Welcome to the railway of Big Boys. Testimonials: Your game is a great representation of what's it like to work in steam loco department with the sheer size of these engines. The amount of detail
