The Stewart Report- Outlook: Monday on 'The Halftime Report' In recent years, one source of Canadian pride is exports. On Monday night, we'll learn how the Canadian companies that made them did. A federal election is just over three months away, and commentators on the political left have been suggesting for months that it could be an important election for the opposition. On August 15, 2015, and then again on October 20, 2015, the votes for the so-called "Orange Wave" seemed to be shifting away from Prime Minister Stephen Harper and towards the left-of-centre Liberals in Canada's unofficial centre. But that trend has not continued since, and now, many investors are forecasting a setback for the Liberals. And it is not just investors. The Beaverton Institute on Tuesday lowered its federal election forecast for the Liberals to 32.3% and for the Conservatives to 58.1%. On Monday, the Beazerle Institute of Finance said the latest shift did not reassure investors. The markets were moving lower, reacting to a government report outlining the problems with the Canadian economy. In spite of all this, Canada appears to be in an enviable position: its debt to GDP ratio is at 38%, slightly below most other G7 countries. However, much of that is because the federal deficit is still running at a high $26 billion a year, and if that continues, it will become more difficult to generate sustainable growth. The housing market is also cooling, but that is the result of intentional and unconscious government policies designed to foster a strong economy, not the other way round. Still, expectations of favourable comments about the outlook of the economy in speeches and media interviews by Bank of Canada governor Stephen Poloz over the weekend seem to have alarmed investors. The bad news seems to have

Youtube: It is a new wind-powered regional bus service in Switzerland. It has been tested in various locations from April 2007 to August 2008. As of April 1, 2010, all bus services in the Capital Region are operated by the WindBus AG. Their regional subsidiary InterRegioCosta is doing the same in the entire region of Costa Navarino, and in the cantons of Locarno and Ticino, as well. Other chapters to follow. Windbus AG is a subsidiary of the DDS Group, a group of electric and hybrid buses in Switzerland. The WindBus system is presented as a model for other regional bus operators who wish to provide their bus services with low cost. It is the result of acquiring new generations of wind power. The vehicles have roof-mounted, electric propeller generators, which are roof-top cascaded like

What's new:

Fernbus Simulator is an open source U.S. operating system for commercial simulation of high-speed rail trains based on DOS and ANS. Fernbus Simulator uses DOS and ANS to simulate the hardware infrastructure of the train, including the control unit, information panel, electronic circuitry, AC and DC electric traction motors, and the mechanical drives. The first release came in June 1999 as version F1a. Version 0.7 was released in 2004 by two authors from the technical college of Adelaide (Australia) and was fully compatible with Windows. Version 0.9 in July 2007 added iTN support and many other graphical improvements (but still no 3D graphics). Version 0.10 and version 0.11 in January 2008 added 'microfinishing' of all the rails and ties, to make the simulation a lot more realistic. The latest release dates are from version 0.12, released in September 2008, and beta 2, released in 2010. The editors at Fernbus Simulator continually try to add more features to the simulator, making it more popular. History Fernbus Simulator was created by Shawn McPhearson in 1999 to simulate the trains used on the Adelaide-Melbourne Intercity Express service (ACE). In late 1998, during his train simulator studies, he worked on the system in his spare time. He then submitted the project to Adelaide Technical College (ATC), where the college provided the help and budget to develop the software to a working point. In June 1999, Fernbus Simulator version 1a became available, which was fully compatible with Windows 3.11. The current project has had many rewrites and versions. Versions F1a and F1b Version F1a was developed at ATC by Shawn McPhearson and signed off by Chris Ewen at the end of 1999. Features of F1a include: Automatic tracing of runs 10 track types available Automatic tracing of profile LED lamps Controller and mouse support in both DOS and Windows It also includes these features, but as an update for F1a: Trains (full sets) Stopping procedures Line preview for all (and selected) lines In 2000, Shawn left Adelaide Technical College to go full time into computer simulation and contract manufacturing. Hence, the licensing of Fernbus Simulator was transferred from ATC to Belcarra Transport. Version F1b was released with no observable differences
