We caught up with FIFA producer Arne Meyer to find out more about the technical innovations of FIFA 22. So, FIFA 22 works in a completely new way. How do you describe the new gameplay? We've never seen anything like it before in a football game. It's not like any other football game. It has a brand new multi-dimensional gameplay with lots of new features. How do you use player motion data to make the game more fun? We use a lot of player motion data. It's all coming from real matches where players used their natural movements in a game, played against each other, and everything was recorded. We use the data from these matches to create an entire new gameplay. Every single player simulation has been redesigned from scratch. And then the physics have also been changed. How were your goals for FIFA 22 gameplay achieved? When we designed the first FIFA game, we had a very specific vision for gameplay. We wanted to incorporate the crowd into the game, make the players visually more real, and create better attacking play. We were very close to what we achieved in the first game. But, from a gameplay perspective, I think we are now really close to what players want to see in football games. What does the new camera system look like? The new camera system isn't just about new camera positions but also about new camera angles and the new way of controlling the camera. We have a new way of measuring the distance to the target, which means that shooting requires a different skill set than we've been using in FIFA games. We want players to be able to use their full range of skill when shooting. It's been tuned to give players the feeling of how they would control a real camera. How do you plan to change the way attacking goes forward? We've created a new movement model for players to make sure that they move more naturally. We've made it so that, like a camera, players can shoot at the moment when they release the ball. We have a system that uses the latest camera technology to detect passing accuracy, so you can make more accurate passes. You can also see the success of your pass by getting reactions from the other players. How do you plan to change the way defending goes forward? We wanted to see more of the technique behind how the match is really being played. In our simulation engine,
