Information quality {#Sec9} ----- The results of this study reveal that some of the desired data are omitted in the literature. For example, the occupation was mentioned in some studies, but it was omitted in most studies. In many studies it was not used to attain the desired information. The extrinsic factors of the studies were not used to obtain the desired information in most cases. The aim of our study was to identify the published research and whether it fulfilled the research design. Most of the studies mentioned the intention and/or research questions. For example, Rensvold et al. \[[@CR16]\] defined long-term sick leave as 30 days or more. The reasons for sick leave were not mentioned in most cases. Similarly, long-term benefits of sick leave, the time of the intervention, and the outcomes of the intervention were not mentioned except in a few cases. The principal author must have performed a critical appraisal of the studies to find out whether they met the research design. This process includes exploration of the demographic and clinical characteristics and exclusion criteria in the included studies. The authors must have gathered the necessary information from the interested studies and made separate files for groups and sub-groups. At the end of the study, the authors must have done comprehensive tables and data extraction for relevant variables. In this way, they need to include the time and duration of the problems, place and study year of the study, the author's name, subject's gender, sample size, and desired statistical information. The key question must have been answered and the primary outcome must have been stated.
