They help me understand the world around me and they bring colour to an otherwise flat, often grey profession. But they can also give context to the research process. These rules are apparently broken when it comes to News Corporation's UK subsidiary, News International. But according to its director of legal affairs, Simon Eagle, they were the rules that ought to have been followed. Eagle was giving evidence to the Leveson inquiry on Tuesday, during which he told MPs how his company "did everything" possible to resolve legal action brought by Gordon Brown's former spin doctor, Andy Coulson. Eagle, the man responsible for signing off legal contracts which saw all of the company's public-relations contacts with the former prime minister replaced, followed the Leveson rules scrupulously. Coulson was the No 2 at the company at the time, and Eagle agreed with MPs that it was illegal for News International to take over the public-relations output of the No 10 press office. Instead, Coulson was merely transferred to his current role as editor of the News of the World, and employed by the company's subsidiary, News International, as a political reporter. In his evidence to the inquiry on Tuesday, Eagle repeated what he has already said at the high court and before parliament: that this was no cover-up, and that he did everything he could to make sure the public-relations department at No 10 was not undermined. Let's consider the facts Eagle laid out at the inquiry. Coulson left the company in July 2007, and what Eagle promised to disclose to MPs is all that the company knew about the former spin doctor and the public relations team he had formerly run. The firm discovered that Coulson had signed contracts to represent Zulima, a young politician. It was unclear to Eagle what this was about. Two days later, it was announced that Coulson was leaving his post. Eagle explains his company's action in a letter of apology issued to Coulson: "We feel it is important
