?) In the olden days, we used to have Her Story. That was a really, really good game. It's probably one of the most moving visual novels out there. Now we have Blue Reflected. Well, they're both games that deal with the Japanese detective genre. But those aren't exactly what catch my attention. It's that they're both games that are fucking beautiful. Both are beautiful in their own ways, and both are beautiful in parts that I didn't expect them to be. I'm not just saying that because here is a game that looks beautiful. Her Story is a game that's really emblematic of the Japanese art style, and yet this one is that too. So that I read that I wouldn't see it. And then, all of a sudden, when it caught my eye again—I don't know how people would feel about this, but I went out of my way to buy this game, and the other people who were there might have something to say about it, but I loved it because I'm almost too much of a perfectionist now to be able to say this looks like shit, but fuck it, I can't not say it. That's in a weird way how it feels to be a player of many indie games. You start to get tired of fucking mountain trails that look like shit and then the turn from mountains to skies. "Oh, look! We have a damn mountain area. I bet there's a goddamn flat area way back there." The first time, it's a rediculous concept, but then you become adapted to it. And then you've got people who are scared by it. They can't possibly understand the high-concept art of these games. They haven't seen "Monochrome of the same." They don't understand, until they see exactly what it is. Because you keep trying it with different words in your head to describe it. You might say "That's dark, but it's not pre-election-of-2003 dark, but it's more of a fitting translation of the Japanese art style." You cannot explain it to them. Because it is highly-conceptual, and you are presenting them with something
