This is a commentary on."To try to drum home the significance of the vote in the Italian elections is to fail in the most distressing way. Michael Gove." Matthew d'Ancona 6:53AM BST 02 Apr 2014 The news that the euro has been driven down almost 8 per cent since Sunday night is one of those occasions when the failure of conventional wisdom, or the obvious, makes an appearance. So, all that washes with green on an otherwise black-and-white chequerboard as the bitter splintering of the European Union reaches its logical conclusion. Here is where the true difficulty of the present predicament lies. All those sanguine commentators, seeking to draw line after line of logic between the two rival camps in the British debate, fail to take account of the effect a bad government in Brussels, or even in Berlin, has on the most vocal element of the Conservative Party. It is easy to look at the upsurge in the euro yesterday - £1.1 trillion was wiped from the value of the euro at one point - and think that it is a clear example of British greed, of a country driven by its national self-interest to do a swap with the country with which it shares the most trade. The point we are being driven to from the other direction by the most anti-European of the Tory critics, David Cameron, and others, is that Britain is now a "safe haven
