In the world of Celosia, children become full adults at age 15. It is a common misconception that, in Celosia, people stop growing once they become adults. This is a myth. The Celosians of the West have been making sweeping changes towards recycling, genetic engineering and expansion into outer space and it is now time for the East to catch up. In order to make the Celosian empire stable, the Celosian Empire is planning to start a joint effort with the neighboring Lanzi people to set up an experimental colony in West Dusch. This will lead to the establishment of a new experimental district known as Dusch. The official goal of the city is to find a cure for the strange endowments Celosians possess. However, the people in the West are not the only ones with a keen eye on Celosia. The Canaan Foundation is currently using the newfound power of Celosia's industrially developed and uninhabited land to prepare for war. Their goal is to tap into the dormant powers of Celosia's other young people and bring them to Celosia's side. A few years ago, Celosia had an effective means of defending itself thanks to its three pillars: Power, Wisdom and Honor. However, the Canaan Foundation not only wants to protect Celosia but also plans to rule it. Thus, it is now dangerous for Celosia to gather new people from other nations to battle with. What kind of things will this Celosian colony in the West do? Only the future will tell! William Barr: Feds Accuse Top Lawyer Of Colluding With Russia Enlarge this image toggle caption Alex Wong/Getty Images Alex Wong/Getty Images When President Trump asked Attorney General William Barr to investigate potential obstruction of justice by his 2020 Democratic opponents, that request created some unusual tension in Washington. As the Trump administration headed into another year in office, special counsel Robert Mueller was closing in on President Trump's inner circle — and Barr was walking a fine line between serving as the public face of the Justice Department and protecting the White House. The outcome of the investigation is in question. Some of Trump's closest allies are in jail — and others, including Mueller's two top deputies, have resigned. Congressional Democrats have sent Robert Mueller's report to Barr for classification, and even Russian military hackers have posted it online — setting up another battle in court over the scope of Barr's review. And Barr has faced calls from Democrats and some Republicans to be more forthcoming about the findings and how he arrived at them. Trump has again attacked Barr and accused him of trying to protect the president. Just as important, Barr and top Justice Department officials have been trying to fend off litigation related to former FBI Director James Comey's Russia investigation, and the fallout that came from that probe. Barr's Justice Department recently informed a federal judge that former U.S. Attorney General Jeff Sessions and Deputy Attorney General Rod Rosenstein supported Comey's actions "to an unprecedented degree and at the expense of critical Department policies and political interests." The label directly contradicts their previous public statements — and could undercut Barr's account if they have to testify in the case. During his confirmation hearings, Barr said he was "not aware" of anyone from the Justice Department complaining to the White House or about anyone being fired to block the Russia investigation. The conversations were recorded and transcribed by Comey's friend, Columbia University law professor Daniel Richman. "Does he dispute that?" Sen. Leahy asked at Barr's confirmation hearing. "Yes, he does," Richman told a panel of senators. "But not publicly." He explained that Comey had privately expressed to Rosenstein his concerns about Trump's obstruction during the conversations, which Rosenstein discounted as coming from "a political source." So what did happen? And who spoke up? It's not clear from the public record that will be revealed by Mueller's report. Department officials, aware of the tensions, talked about protecting the White House —
