The same test for differences by race found a significant difference by race, with White women having an Odds Ratio of .60 (.53,.68) and Black women having an Odds Ratio of .40 (.30,.53) compared to their White male counterparts. The same test for differences by race found a significant difference by race, with Black women having an Odds Ratio of .60 (.53,.68) and White women having an Odds Ratio of .40 (.31,.52) compared to their White male counterparts. Calculations and interpretations differ for the following categories of differences: More than twice as likely Twice as likely About the same Less than half as likely Half as likely Twice as likely or more Among the variables compared here are: People who do not earn a college degree, vs. people who do People in the lowest income group, vs. people in the highest income group People who are poor, vs. people who are middle class White men, vs. Black men White women, vs. Black women Black men, vs. White men Black women, vs. White women The following is a comparison of odds ratios with a reference category in which the odds ratios are the same for each group: Twice as likely About the same Half as likely About the same Twice as likely or more For example, White men are about 2.0 times as likely as Black men to have had problems getting medical care. Converting odds ratios Because the odds ratios are fractions, odds ratios can be converted into percentages by dividing the two. In the following example, three groups are being compared, and the odds ratios are for the third group vs. the first and second groups. Therefore, the odds ratio in this case is , and dividing by 4, the percentage is 25. Thus, the percentage of people who have experienced problems getting medical care, after adjustment for education and income, is 25%. Problems with odds ratios After encountering a difference, but before understanding what it means, investigators may be tempted to calculate the odds ratio as a comparison between two groups. For example, “women with the most

From 1953 through August 1989, 626 patients underwent TPC-JAPA at the Massachusetts General Hospital. From 1953 through 1967, 213 (33.6%) had an anterior resection and 293 (46.9%) had a subtotal colectomy. In later years, all patients underwent subtotal colectomy. Follow-up for the entire group was complete in 99.6% of cases. The survival rate for the entire group was 95.2% at 10 years, 87.7% at 15 years, and 70.9% at 20 years. The median follow-up was 21 years. TPC-JAPA in infants was associated with increased risk of low-voltage detrusor activity. Despite the increased risk of chronic urinary dysfunction, TPC-JAPA performed for ulcerative colitis was 0cc13bf012
