This is where expertise and experience in one area of the market — defense or, alternatively, business aviation in general — can be invaluable in overcoming problems with insurance, customers and other misbehaving clients. More than ever before, the customer's perspective and experience in the business-aviation marketplace have a direct and immediate impact on business-aviation professionals. So knowing their needs and concerns is vital. The first step in that effort involves any company that wishes to be successful in business aviation. It starts with research. Who are the players? What should their customers and prospects expect of them? How should they behave? How does business aviation differ from personal aviation? Why are customers leaving? Why
