Playboy movies at The Savoy Long before Hugh Hefner, founder of Playboy magazine, stepped from his office to the cutting room to watch the final edit of his first film, he may have had a tailor on hand to make him some shorts that would be comfortable while he labored. The Playboy movies at The Savoy are a recent addition to the Savoy's list of films with fascinating credits. Re-screening the 1962 war film, The Deadly Mantis, with a new addition, composer Dirk Brossé, and director Jean-Paul Coursodon, this edition has a new introduction by Australian author Hugh Lunn, who is also writing a book on the year-long making of the film. An even older edition, from 1961, restores the legendary co-screenplay of Val Lewton and Jacques Tourneur, The Curse of the Cat People. The film follows a young male prostitute who befriends a young female girl, and falls in love with her while battling a mysterious and powerful underworld dealer known as the Cat. The film's ultimate triumph is its transgressive sexuality, which, in the decades since its original release, has only intensified. Deanna Durbin's one and only movie, This Happy Madness, is also in action in this edition. It is set in the 1920s when Durbin is a young, newly married woman. She and her husband, played by John Gilbert, move from Chicago to New York, where she takes a job as an actress. In the city of Broadway and Tin Pan Alley, in a period of change for the American woman, Durbin finds opportunities for self-fulfillment, though she finds herself using her husband's name and position as an excuse to do so. In the end, she hits rock bottom, returning to her old life as a restaurant cook. A passionate and vivid portrait of life in New York during this era. Also included is a third edition of Harry and Toto. Working with painter Robert Beverly e79caf774b
