One of the reasons that many of us have never had access to the freely available fountain of information available on the Internet, is that the quality of the content is often low and the content difficult to navigate around. One of the greatest assets to the Internet is the fact that it's an information super highway, unlike libraries, where a stack of books is much better suited to the thought process required to access information in a useful manner. While a search engine such as Google is terrific for accessing what we want, very often we want to know exactly what this means, and the Wikipedia is there to explain this meaning and nuances. Imagine what an incredible resource the Internet would be if we could even partially take advantage of it's true potential to allow anyone to learn anything that they wanted to know about. Well luckily, there are some people who are developing that dream. Many researchers are developing the next phase in accessing the internet as a knowledge driven tool. These researchers are developing a space where there is no barrier to entry and indeed no "trained" users that most of us are used to. In this world, everyone learns from each other, and it would be one of the greatest things to happen to humanity yet. This paradigm will allow anyone, 6d1f23a050
