VIEWS: David Suzuki Published May 4, 2007 6:00 am As a scientist, I believe we must continue to develop ways to live sustainably on the planet and I support efforts to protect the oceans and forests, and to reduce the use of fossil fuels. We are the current winners of the environment and we need to celebrate our good fortune. But as a human, I also believe in being good ambassadors of our species. As a citizen of the world, I recognize the critical threat to all of us of a planet whose climate is changing rapidly. As a scientist, I know that we will need to work together in new ways to protect our species from the dangers of runaway climate change. I worry that the current wave of anti-science rhetoric in B.C. and elsewhere is a movement that is spreading from the United States to Canada. This type of thinking plays into the hands of the vested interests who want to keep petroleum and coal in the ground. On the other side are the industry and government leaders who need these fossil fuels to meet our energy needs for economic prosperity and security. The fact is we need energy and we need new alternatives -- renewable, sustainable energy. We have the chance to make this move, but only if we come together as one world. We need to support the research that can help us move to a sustainable energy future. We need to be open to being part of the solution rather than being blinded by fear. And we need to come together to solve the many challenges of a changing world. Story continues after photo We need to do all this with our common best interest in mind, because collectively we know that we are the future winners. And if we continue to ignore a future that will probably lead to widespread
