In the recent years, the incidence of cutaneous malignant melanomas has risen dramatically in Western countries. Extensive surgery and radiation have not appreciably reduced the annual incidence of regional disease. Photodynamic therapy (PDT) makes use of the selective localization of a photosensitizing drug at a tumoral site. The photosensitizer is activated by light of specific wavelengths. Unfortunately, the spatial resolution of this technology is lower than that achieved with current x-ray or interstitial techniques. PDT is however a minimally invasive surgical modality and it appears highly promising in the management of early stage melanomas.How to use Facet design to facilitate skill transfer in nursing students? The purpose of this study was to investigate how facilitation of skill transfer in nursing students can be enhanced using a facilitation design approach. Nurse education is moving from the traditional didactic model to a situated and collaborative practice teaching modality. As a result, educators are struggling to find ways to facilitate students' learning process. There is increasing evidence that learning occurs in everyday life in many situations and is enhanced when active involvement in learning is facilitated. A qualitative methodology of purposeful sampling was used to gather data from three focus group interviews with ten nursing students. The analysis was aimed at identifying the skills of the participants and at identifying facilitation design strategies to facilitate the transfer of these skills to the clinical settings. The findings revealed that nursing students had difficulty transferring the skills they had learned to clinical situations. Nursing educators' concern for student learning could benefit from using a facilitation design approach to enhance the transfer of basic nursing skills to clinical situations. The facilitation design approach could enhance the transfer of skills to clinical settings, through enhancing the quality of the instructor-student learning relationship by increasing the nurse educator's efforts to encourage students to apply their learning in their daily life, and by increasing the nurse educator's active involvement in the pedagogy of learning to better help the students transfer their skills to clinical situations
