Portland Planning Commission Votes against Plan to Add 21 New Bikeshare Stations posted by Greater Portland Commission of Governments While the City of Portland, Multnomah County and the Portland Transportation Bureau have all signed on to a plan to add 21 new bicycle share stations, the Portland Planning Commission did not. Members of the planning commission voted 8-4 against recommending that the city council adopt the plan. The council will now have to vote on the plan and the city will need to take another vote if it decides to adopt the plan. The lack of a unified position from the Portland Planning Commission was not due to disagreement about the size of the expansion. Rather, some commissioners were concerned that a station on the southwest side of the Rose Quarter was not necessary. Commissioner Michael Marks suggested a station that was needed to serve the site of Portland State University's new campus would be more appropriate. The Rose Quarter area station would be located on SW Pitts and SW Morrison. The Portland Transportation Bureau is funded by a 3-cent sales tax. It has contracts with several companies to provide services including bikeshare stations, bicycle trails and local funding for cycling facilities. In late August, members of Portland Bike
