It was said that the story began with an. "for Love's Sake" There has been known a technique of reducing the occurrence of collisions when a large-scale, high-performance microprocessor is to be controlled through communication control. For example, there is suggested a method of sending/receiving a plurality of messages over a network, using existing techniques, and of reducing occurrences of collisions. For example, there is suggested a method of providing a packet-to-packet failure recovery protocol (Forward Secrecy (FS) protocol) in addition to a TCP protocol (Transmission Control Protocol) to address failures occurring in protocols other than a TCP protocol that are combined with TCP, and of performing a packet-to-packet failure recovery (FS protocol) (see Patent Document 1). Further, in a case of sending/receiving a plurality of messages over a network, if the number of messages to be sent/received is larger than the bandwidth of the network, a message that has not been received is thrown back to a sending side, and packets are retransmitted thereupon. If the number of messages to be sent/received is smaller than the bandwidth of the network, a sending/receiving side is temporarily blocked from sending a packet or receiving a packet. Further, there is a known technique for a microprocessor that performs multicast communication in a case of transmitting a large number of messages, such as, for example, a DVD (Digital Versatile Disc), which is described in Patent Document 2. A method of performing multicast communication that is described in Patent Document 2 is a method of transmitting a plurality of messages using a multicast-to-unicast switch. In other words, there is a problem that a specific party needs to preliminarily designate which receiving party will receive the transmitted message.
