I have a form with a drop down list. 100 200 300 When I select a value from this list I need to get the field. I'm trying to get the selected value using JQuery:

`var field = $('#id option:selected').val();`

This gives me undefined. A: You can use the option tag instead and its value property:

`$('#id option[value="2"]').val();` Microsoft has published a company-wide meeting attendance policy in an effort to encourage employees to be present, and catch up on work, at company meetings.

The online document, which appears to have been leaked to ZDNet, lays out a policy according to which company leaders "will be held accountable for keeping our employees in the loop about our business agenda."

The target is apparently very specific. Particular questions will be asked, apparently at the discretion of individual leaders, at every weekly one-on-one meeting. For example, one question will ask, "Did you learn anything new?" And the answers, apparently, should be "yes." Most of this appears to be fairly common knowledge, but I am not at all convinced that everyone will automatically accept this new policy. For example, the summary says employees "are responsible for being present and participating at all meetings... where decisions are made." In light of the increasingly-prevalent culture of "do what you want, when you want, and how you want," I'm not sure that the idea of strict, enforced attendance at every meeting is necessarily a good idea. It just might reinforce the idea that you must c6a93da74d
